WORKERS SAVE WHAT THEY CAN FROM WINDS

Workmen remove folding chairs and other equipment from a large revival tent as strong winds make ribbons of tent. Assemblies of God have been holding nightly revivals in the tent at W. 88th Ave. and Sheridan Blvd. Rick Toliver, son of the tent manager, said it would take six months and $25,000-$30,000 to replace the shelter.

FEW RESTRAINTS, ECONOMIST SAYS

Health-Cost Rise Laid to 'Incentives'

By JOHN BOSLOUGH
Denver Post Staff Writer

The cost of health care is rising faster than the costs of other goods and services because the organization and financing of health care provide "cost-increasing incentives and few restraints."

Moreover, said Alain C. Enthoven, Ph.D., professor of public and private management at Stanford University, "This incentive for cost-increasing behavior is often reinforced by the demands of the anxious patient and his family who want the doctor to 'do something' whether or not it will be effective."

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Group Health Institute Monday at the Denver Hilton Hotel, Enthoven cited statistics showing that the nation spent more than $118 billion—or $547 per person—for health care last year.

THAT COMPARES with just $39 billion in 1965 and $198 per capita, Enthoven said, adding that, even when deflated by the Consumer Price Index, the difference represents a 62 per cent increase in just 10 years.

"Of course," he said, "much of this increase in per capita spending should be a source of legitimate pride, not a cause for alarm."

He explained that part of the large increase in health spending resulted from Medicaid, Medicare and large increases in private health insurance coverage as well as bringing health-care workers' pay in line with the level in other industries.

"HOWEVER, THESE factors do not help much to explain or justify recent continuing high rates of increases in the costs of health services," Enthoven said. He cited figures showing that physician fees rose 14.2 per cent and hospital rates 20.1 per cent last year compared with other service prices which rose at an 8.9 per cent annual rate.

Enthoven said the fee-for-service for doctors and cost reimbursement for the hospital are partly to blame.

"Fee-for-service rewards physicians with more income for providing more care and more expensive care whether or not more is necessary, effective or beneficial to the patient," he explained.

"And cost reimbursement for the hospital (payment of cost-based charges) rewards the hospital with more revenue for providing more costly care whether or not more costly care is necessary, effective or beneficial to the patient," he added.

ADDITIONALLY, THE professor said, third-party insurance relieves the patient of most of the extra cost. "So he has little incentive to question the need for the expenditures made on his behalf, and is in a poor position to do so in any case.

"And the third-party payer is also in a weak position to control costs," Enthoven added.

"If we know anything about economic behavior—a hypothesis that I as an economics professor feel found to support—then we can predict with confidence that such a system of incentives will produce chronic inflation," he said.

To curb inflation, then, it's necessary to change the existing incentives and replace them with a "system of rational economic incentives that encourage economy and efficiency in the use of health care resources," the professor said.

THE NEW SYSTEM would reward physicians for providing less costly care, encouraging preventive medicine and avoiding unnecessary care, he said.

And consumers should have a "free choice from among competing systems of care, but if they elect a more costly system, they should be prepared to pay the difference themselves," he added.

Enthoven said the answer to the dilemma appears to be "the framework of incentives within which prepaid group practice plans operate."

"And the evidence is pretty strong that they have done a much better job of controlling costs than their fee-for-service competitors."

Army to Probe Alleged Beatings

FT. CARSON, Colo. — An investigation into alleged beatings of two Ft. Carson soldiers on May 24 was to begin Tuesday in a post courtroom.

Maj. Arne Andersen, a 4th Infantry Division public information officer, said the investigation is similar to a grand jury hearing, but is open to the press.

Andersen said the proceedings are being held to determine if an Army captain and two sergeants should be court-martialed for their alleged involvement in the beating incident.

The officer, Capt. George O. Charity, has been relieved of his command. A, 1st Battalion, 22nd Infantry, said.

The two sergeants so far identified by Ft. Carson are:
