Dear President Ford;

I wish I could speak for all Americans in thanking you for a job well done as President. Losing this election does not mean the people are not appreciative of the good job you did in leading this country through a difficult period, and in restoring confidence in the presidency.

In 1944 Prime Minister Winston Churchill lost an election. He had not originally been elected to the office of Prime Minister, was called to serve, performed exceptionally well in leading his country through a difficult period of time, achieved the intended goal, and was defeated at the polls. Yet the people greatly admired Churchill and were certainly appreciative of what he had done for the country. They just wanted a change. I think the situation surrounding this week's election is very similar to the English election of 1944.

While I think you would have been the best man for the presidency over the next four years, the thing this country needs to give you now is a vote of thanks. You gave America what it needed, when it needed it.

My best to you and your family.

Sincerely,

JERROLD S. JENSEN
